

Figure 3-4: Future Development Potential: Distribution by Jurisdiction and Degree of Constraint

As this graph illustrates, more than half of the future development potential in the region is located on existing residential lots within the unincorporated part of Los Angeles County (back row of graph), and most of those parcels are highly constrained (right side of graph). Retiring the development potential on these lots should be a priority for reducing future cumulative impacts in the region.